The Glen Road Gardens

WELLESLEY FARMS, MASS.

In looking down the iris path of memory the beginning seems far away and very simple. When I issued my first list in 1917 it was a necessity in order to distribute the novelties upon which I had received awards from the Massachusetts Horticultural Society. Changes came slowly, but with the organization of The American Iris Society in 1920 they came faster and faster until today there are over 170 breeders and some 140 commercial growers on their membership list. The necessity for 1917 has passed.

At present no one can know, even casually, many of the 1400 varieties registered within the last two years. Hence where possible it is advisable for those who wish to buy to visit gardens and to select from the flowering plants. It is also convenient as in most localities the time to plant the Bearded Irises is after they have flowered.

The omission of a catalog and all that it entails has permitted me to gather in my trial beds over 160 of the Novelties that I have liked; and they should bloom this season. The list is particularly rich in Californian introductions, which do well for me. These novelties are for the Specialist perhaps, rather than for the majority who need irises as a supply of pure colors with which to paint their garden picture, for at this time of year no other perennial can supply masses in their colors with height in addition. I must add a few notes from Miss Pesel's article in the English 1932 Iris Year Book. She is an embroiderer and has applied her rules for color contrasts and harmonies to iris plantings. She recommends a predominant color for the foundation, composed of MANY varieties differing in tone, against which clumps of different brilliant colors will 'tell'. Or a planting with a "recurring note", a somber under-current to the tall and vivid kinds. She says the secret of the successful use of yellow is to use plenty and of many different shades, heights, and sizes of flowers. "After planting a batch of blending and harmonious colors do not be afraid to put in a startling and unexpected contrast, just to make the whole scheme sing".

My interest is still in hybridizing and I am glad that I may still send out a cordial invitation to old friends and new to visit the gardens and to enjoy rock garden and garden settings as well as the iris masses and novelties.

The garden is always open to visitors, but the business hours are from 8 A. M. to 5 P. M. every day except Sunday.
